ABSTRACT

One in a series, this bibliography cites books, dissertations, government documents, and journal articles examining education at all levels in Kenya. Topics dealt with include educational history, educational practices, and educational policy. The collection was compiled from the catalogs and other available indexes within the libraries at Stanford. The majority of the resources are housed within the Stanford libraries. Most cited works do not predate Kenya's attainment of independence in December of 1963, and are in the English language. Some works, however, were included for their historical significance or to provide the student with background information. (Author/RM)

This is one of an irregular series of bibliographic and resource guides meant to assist Stanford School of Education students in locating materials and utilizing services in the Libraries of Stanford.

We frequently have received requests for guides to services and collections, for bibliographies on the development of educational systems in specific geographical areas, or for selected lists of materials on topics of current research interest. Although Cubberley staff members often have prepared brief bibliographies for individual student use, heretofore, they had not been issued in a format appropriate for distribution. Our hope is that this series will meet these expressed needs by providing handy lists and guides to resources and services available not only on the Stanford campus, but at the University of California, Berkeley, and at other member libraries of the Research Libraries Group. Internally, we have found those bibliographies compiled to date useful in identifying our collections' strengths and weaknesses. They are a helpful tool for the evaluation of core collections and for identifying gaps in our coverage of various subject and geographic areas.

The bibliographies make no particular attempt to be exhaustive or representative. There is a bias toward materials available at Stanford and toward sources in English and other Western languages. Although guidelines concerning format and style are provided, individual compilers are free to decide upon the best way to present their material. Area bibliographies use format divisions since these often correspond to library locations and seem most helpful to users. Annotations often are provided when the titles of articles or books do not indicate their relationship to the topic at hand. It should be borne in mind that these aids are not definitive and are intended for the researcher beginning work in a particular subject or geographic area. We encourage you to consult with one of the librarians for assistance with more advanced research.

Your comments on and criticisms of this series are invited; we welcome suggestions for future bibliographies and guides.

This selected list of sources relating to education and development in Kenya was compiled from the catalogs and other available indexes within the Libraries of Stanford. Most cited works do not predate Kenya's attainment of independence in December 1963. Some works, however, were included for their historical significance or to provide the student with background information. Only a few items have been seen, but short of viewing each item, every effort has been made to ensure accuracy in citation. It is noted that inconsistencies may arise with those citations retrieved from the ERIC data-base which are cited herein as retrieved.
